Psychology Filtered Through Scripture Jennifer Marie McCarron two should never conflict, and if they do it is only in human understanding. "All truth is God's truth," (Carter & Narramore, , p. 13) whether found in the Bible or in from Biblical principles. Psychology is a Valid Form of General Revelation. Based upon this assumption, the Integrates model seeks to integrate biblical and psychological-research revelations into a unified view of human nature. The resulting Weltanschauung is ever in flux, however, owing to the continually advancing and expanding scope of scientific knowledge and theory. Psychology should be open to investigating, as a unified field of knowledge, all of the phenomena of human experience, including the facts of science as well as the realities of faith. Therefore, the transformational model is critical of methodologies that are based upon naturalistic presuppositions. The concepts of human nature, life struggles, health, and treatment modality in psychology span a broad spectrum. The majority of counselors and psychologists today practice somewhat eclectically; they are not strictly Freudian or Jungian but are versed in several theories and employ different parts of the theories for different presenting issues.

Secular psychologists operate on a biopsychosocial model of human development and behavior. This model proposes humans develop and operate according to biological, psychological, and social. Basic premise: Psychology and biblical theology deal with different dimensions of human life, use different methods of study, ask different questions, and look .
